The pocket of Alois's overcoat was found to be a regular thief's bag. He had torn out the pocket lining, making the pocket deeper. It contained a bunch of keys of all sorts, two screw drivers, two tack hammers, a big hammer, two boxes of crayon pencils, a bottle of sperm oil, a box of shoe polish, an invitation to the Kismet Club, two visiting cards, bearing the names of Dr. Carlos W. When questioned he gave contradictory statements. First he claimed that his parents were dead. Then he said:

"Why, of course, they are living."

He then claimed that his father was a chef at the Hotel Maurice, at Fifth avenue and Forty-second street. Alois added that two other boys, named Wagner and Miller, taught him to become a thief. He said that he made their acquaintance some weeks ago, but claimed that he did not know where either of them lived.

In court this morning he told a different story. He said that his parents had died in Germany a little over two years ago, and that shortly after their death he and his brother John, twenty. John found work in the Hotel Maurice, and has been supporting both on his carnings.

"I am a thief," he said. "Those two boys. Wagner and Miller, have been stealing right along. I only travelled with them three days. They used to do all the stealing. I only went along with them. Yesterday they told me to make myself useful in their absence by opening the druggist's chewing gum machine."

The unknown man walked ahead and Nappo lingered a step or two in front of the victim. The unknown man drew a handkerchief from his pocket and, as if by accident, pulled out a pocketbook, which fell to the ground.

Nappa picked this up amid great excitement and curiosity on the part of the crowd of emigrants. The pocket-book contained several Confederate brownbacks, one being a $100 bill. There were also several places of "stage money."

Although both cars were filled with passengers, Axtell was the only person fourt. James Mallory, a stockman of Hates-vile, and was in the country at the centre street and Company at Thirteenth street and Washington avenue last night, receiving injuries from which he died.
